Mme. Ali Kuli Khan Says Women Are Up to Date.

THEY MIX IN POLITICS

The Veil Is Popular, Since It Allows Husband to See Only His Wife.

It was just about a year ago that Mme. Ali Kuli Khan, wife of the Persian chargé d'affaires, was in New York to bid good-bye to five young Americans who were sailing away to rejuvenate Persia. Among the five was one W. Morgan Shuster, and now Mme. Ali Kuli Khan is in New York again, not quite so willing to talk about the rejuvenation of Persia as she was a year ago. The recent adventures of that Mr. W. Morgan Shuster have elevated Persian affairs to the plane of high diplomacy on which one may not speak save in whispers.

Madame received the Tribune reporter with her usual grace, but with a worried look in her eyes. "Did you hear how they introduced my husband, at the Cornell alumni dinner?" she asked. "It was very funny. 'We will not speak from Ali Kuli Khan, who will not speak from the Persian situation with the freedom which has characterized the utterances of our friend, Morgan Shuster.' That applies to me just as much as to him. I can't talk, either, though, of course, I'm tremendously interested."

"But about the modern women in Persia—oh, I could talk of them for days! You know, they're my friends. I lived with them, and I really know them better, I believe, than any other woman in the world. Travellers and visitors, even in the diplomatic circles, rarely become well acquainted with the Persian women, but I learned the language and adopted the veil, so I really became one of them. Therefore, I say with assurance that the Persian women are not downtrodden, not kept in ignorant subjection. They are brilliant intellectually. They are well educated and familiar with the Persian classics. They quote poetry in their conversation as well as very few women in America are able to do, Shakespeare."

"And as for being up to date! You should see the articles written by women editors and poets demanding women's rights or particular social reforms. There is nothing more fiery in England or America. Of course, however, the actual question of suffrage is being agitated by a comparatively small number, but the women as a whole are keenly alive to problems of political and social reform."

"What about the woman's organization which Mr. Shuster has said came to his assistance?" "The question was put quite innocently. Women and politics are so mixed up these days. Well, this, it seems, was political, and Ali Kuli Khan himself answered blandly with an elaborate description of the Women's Educational Association. The education of the masses is their aim, it seems, and women of all classes work together for this end. In places where there are not public schools the noblewomen establish them in their own grounds and visit them personally every morning. The cultivated women speak not only Persian, Arabic and in the schools French and English are being eagerly studied by the young girls, who are aware of the 'world movement.' In Tehran, Mme. Ali Kuli Khan founded the first girls' school along American lines in 1905. Now there are thirty or forty in that city alone and others all over the country, organized by this Women's Educational Association."

It was quite true, however, the Persian diplomat admitted, that there were a few suffragettes in his troubled land, and they really did demand the right to vote, even as it happened. The younger and radical members of the National Assembly entered a plea for woman suffrage on the ground that women were citizens. The conservatives would have naught of it. Then the statesman who trod the middle course in their pacifying voices. "While we recognize," they said, in substance, "the justice of this question, and cannot consent to its abolition, still we realize there are subjects of more immediate and pressing character, for which this must be set aside for the present, and meantime it is wiser to concern ourselves with school and child welfare problems."

PARK ENTRANCE HELD UP.

As for the delicate questions of marriage and divorce in Persia, neither Mme. Ali Kuli Khan nor her husband agreed with what Mr. Shuster is reported to have said—that a husband in Persia can have as many wives as he wants, and can divorce them as easily.

"I never knew a Persian man of refinement who was more than one wife," Madame said definitely, "and in all the homes I visited—in homes of rich and contest yesterday to see which class could do the best in singing and cheering. The contest was to be decided by judges chosen from among the faculty. Barnard's "sing song" is an annual occasion. Each class composes and sings two college songs, one serious and one non-serious. This year a special new feature in the shape of a college yell was added to the contest. After the judges had filed in and taken their places facing the college on the small Brinkerhoff stage, the "freshies" began with their non-serious song, and the other classes followed in turn. In between times, while the judges were debating in a secret convalesce which was the best, the waiting college sang and cheered with all its might. The juniors carried off the laurels by winning six points of the contest. The seniors came second, and the sophomores and freshmen were tied for third place. TACKS TROUBLE PARK BEARS

Keeper Rescues Pete and Jack from Work of Joker.

Pete and Jack, two brown bears in the Central Park menagerie, will hereafter know a tack when they see it. They gained their experience yesterday when the joker tossed a handful of tacks into their inclosure. Noting that the bears were extremely nervous and were dancing about the cage, a park patrolman went in search of Robert Hurton, who has charge of the bears. Hurton found Pete trying to examine the bottom of one foot, but every time the bear sat down he rose again hurriedly and howled. The keeper discovered a number of tacks lying on the concrete flooring of the cage. He got a broom and swept them out of the way and Pete then managed to extract the tack which had penetrated his tough sole.
